

Clara Louise Kellogg.
If ever a woman was both shrewd and social that woman is Clara Louise Kellogg. She combines the liveliness of a French woman with the worldly acumen of the Yankee, and can make a bargain as readily as she can sing a song. No girl that ever lived was ever fitted to take better care of herself, or has more faithfully fulfilled her destiny. In this laudable course she has been sustained and cherished by the kindest and truest of mothers, who has become the dread of managers, none of whom have ever been able to gain a point on her on a contract of any conceivable sort of a pecuniary transaction. Born of good family, Miss Kellogg has ever kept within the charmed circles of good society, and backed by the Stoddards' family, and other monied connections, has fairly won and kept her operative spurs. She is an industrious woman and a conscientious artist, and though full of herself, full of her future, intensely vain, and excessively ambitious, earns the right to be all this by her unwearied professional activity, and her undoubted professional talent. Socially, when not "grinding any axe," Miss Kellogg is a charming companion, and when in her summer-house at Cold Spring, on the Hudson, entertains elegantly, though not frequently. Warren, formerly the bank detective, now the superintendent of a Broadway dry goods store, is one of her intimate friends, and it has for a long time been taken for granted that young Stoddards was engaged to her, until he married another lady. Miss Kellogg has refused more offers of marriage than any woman of her age in the country; and really, whether warned by the fate of other operatives we know not, it seems that she is of those very few women who have made up their minds not to marry. An English baronet and a Russian nobleman have been numbered among her admirers; but if she affects any one at all—matrimonially speaking—she certainly has managed to keep her own counsel well. Of late she has taken it into her head to become fat; she indulges freely in beefsteak; and avoids agents—with what success remains to be seen. Her wardrobe is rich, but not what would be expected of a professional of her rank; her toilets off the stage are recherche but not extravagant; she lives comfortably with her parents on East Twenty-fifth street, and is worth a good deal of money in bank and real estate. She is not charitable, though she gives occasionally to deserving objects, and would make a thorough man of the world, were she not so charming a woman.
